night. It is a play which appeals alike to the intellect and the emotions—an entirly dignified and clever piece of work, interesting from the philosophic and attractive from the romantic point of view. The theme is symbolic, one might almost say allegorical. It is, to state it in the most general terms, the experiences of an unsophisticated family who had become dissatisfied with their lot in the social world of chicanery and deceit, and of their ultimate rescue and rehabilitation by their brother. Though there is no departure from probability in the relations of the personages, they are at the same time perfectly typical on a symbolic plane. The picture enthralls you by its literalness, its numerous cunning touches, its vraisemblance. The play begins slowly, but is never dull, and the opening situation once made clear, the action is followed throughout with interest and sympathy.
